News You Can Use

All perfect guys: TAKEN

We regret to inform all you lovely Wheaton ladies out there that the last perfect guy on campus was snapped up at 5:06 A.M. GMT on Tuesday, March 11. Please demonstrate to the rest of us guys the care and concern you would a decent-sized roach.

Problem of evil: SOLVED

For two minutes and thirty seconds, a 4.0 philosophy major had the problem of evil's butt kicked. He started out just typing up a paper on the subject but ended up eloquently waxing out that mofo. Evil did a good job of defending itself though.. the blue screen of death came up before he had a chance to save the paper. Then the computer wouldn't reboot because evil loaded itself into the file allocation table and fried the hard drive.

All bad luck in love traced back to chain letters

It's official. Our crack team of uglilogists have traced all bad luck in love to unanswered chain letters. We interviewed thousands and thousands of people who didn't propagate the chain letters to the customary 10 friends. What we found was astonishing. In every case but one they had experienced bad luck in love. Rejection, failure, Dear John letters, restraining orders, dates from hell, not getting called back, and just plain hate were just some of the ways the bad luck expressed itself. This article was brought to you by the Small Business Association of Chain Letter Marketing.

Lonesday Clock to Indicate Terminal Loneliness Threat

The mass proliferation of rejection throughout campus has our editors worried. The lonesday clock isn't going to help, but it's a fun way to measure just how pathetic you are doing... with every turn-down or ounce of rejection, the clock creeps closer to midnight. If something good actually happens like somebody of the opposite sex talks to someone and you think they were talking to you, the clock gets pushed back a minute. The closer to midnight the clock gets, the higher the chances of you ending up terminally alone.
